

bomb was dropped in Japan, the number of employees was down by several thousand. Closing the plant was a complicated job. Lumber that had been in contact with TNT had to be removed and destroyed - often in very "explosive" operations. Buildings had to be sold, and the land returned to other uses. Much of it eventually was returned to farming, with the first choice of buying it back going to the farmers who had been forced to sell it to the government at the beginning of the war. A new law was passed which set prices at no more per acre than it had been worth when the farmers had sold it several years before. Most of it went back to the farmers. Returned veterans were given second choice, with land being made available on a sort of a lottery system. The value of the property was somewhat impaired by its condition after the war as some of the existing structures, such as the storage bunkers - called the "igloos" were difficult to remove and were not of much use left as they were. It was hard to farm the land between the bunkers, and their use for large storage items was rather limited - for example, they could not accomodate tractors or combines. There are still a number of bunkers left on the land, some of which are used for storage for various smaller items. A number of concrete pads left in the fields have served as bases for grain silos.

Several "alumni" of the Sangamon Ordnance Plant attended our meeting and added their reminiscenses to Mr. McCarthy's programs, recalling some of the reasons for the plant's location in Illiopolis. Other ordnance plants were in operation on the east coast but it was decided that an inland location would be much safer in case of attacks or bombing on the coast, so many plants were constructed in the Midwest. Also, it was thought that the type of work required was best understood by coal miners in particular, of whom there were many in this area.

After his program Mr. McCarthy answered many questions about the plant. Our members appreciated learning something of the history of this landmark in eastern Sangamon County.

MEDICAL HISTORY - PERSONAL AND PROFESSIONAL

Our Society's sixth president, Emmet F. Pearson, M.D., has added to his long list of published medical and historical writings a most interesting 67-page monograph which both entertains and educates its readers. My Sixty Years in Medicine relates the story of Emmet's life from his boyhood in the "backwoods of Tennessee", through his years in training active medical practice, military service in WW II, travels on six continents, family life with Mary and their four children, and involvement in community affairs. Along the way he has noted the development of great advances in the field of medicine. His continuing interest is evinced by his statement that "I am still involved in the pursuit of medical history and strongly agree with William Faulkner when he said 'History is, not was'." Our Society members also know of the Pearsons' interest in local history, particularly through their involvement as owners of the 1820's Broadwell Inn at Clayville, which they later donated to Sangamon State University. The Pearsons hosted a number of meetings of the SCHS at Clayville. Emmet also was an early promoter of locating the Southern Illinois University School of Medicine in Springfield, and also established at the school the Pearson Museum, which offers an unique opportunity to study medical history. (Dr. Pearson's book, My Sixty Years in Medicine, is available at Shadid's Book Mart and at the Pearson Museum at the SIU School of Medicine, at $10 per copy.)
